Salutatory

Thirty-five years, gentlemen! Writing the other day of the change that has come since our Commencement, I indulged in reflections to the following effect:

"We did not know, in those days, that we were approaching a new epoch; we could not possibly have imagined, then, the change that has come in what is relatively so short a time. In fact, we who have lived in both periods—that of the fin de siècle and that of the Twentieth Century—do not ourselves yet fully realize how profound is the alteration that has taken place. It has been going on from day to day, even from hour to hour, like the growth of a child to manhood;—those who live with the child thus growing do not find him startling when, at thirty, he weighs one hundred and sixty pounds instead of the seven that was his weight at their first acquaintance with him. But the Massachusetts life convict who went to prison in 1896 and was pardoned in 1927 came back babbling to the penitentiary gates, clamoring piteously for readmission after a week of freedom, dumfounded and panicstricken. From the very moment of his release he might as well have been thrown out upon the surface of another planet.

"Not one person alive in the world when that convict was sentenced could possibly have prophesied what America would be like today. There were a few fanatics who believed that horseless carriages were "coming"; there were even some ridiculous stargazers who thought men would be seen flying overhead within the next five hundred years, perhaps within a hundred; there were devotees of teetotalism who predicted, in the face of jocose scoffing, that "temperance legislation" would some day be enacted in Washington itself; other devotees, even more absurd, predicted something of the kind for "female suffrage"; here and there were persons who foresaw individual advances in science or a coming change in a certain custom or in a certain type of established morality; but there was not on earth a mind that could have foreseen the whole vast change as we are living with it now.

"The absence of such a prophet was not a misfortune. A complete view of this future now existing as the present would have staggered the fin de siècle mind possibly to its unseating. If, by some miracle of prevision, the world of today, completely as it is, could have been seen by the people of that day, there were those among them, particularly among the older clergymen, who, like the friar Captain Brazenhead confessed to, would have "died that same night howling like a wolf."

For we are living in a New World indeed, gentlemen, my classmates, and we seem to have discovered that "nothing really exists except change." Where is the Princeton of your yesteryear? Nowhere except upon a bit of the campus before Old North, and in our memories and in our worn and elderly hearts. True business of Father Time it seems is necromancy. Upon a fine June afternoon he sees us sitting about the cannon in caps and gowns, smoking long white clay pipes, youths of fresh complexion, our thick hair of pleasant color, our own bright teeth displayed when we laugh; and he is moved to cast a spell. "Thirty-five years," he whispers, and all in a trice we are as we are now—most of us as piteously changed as you found a former songster among us when he proved to you (with "Polly's" enthusiastic approval) that he could no longer sing "The Banana Song." Not many of us can remain beautifully undefaced like Tom Titsworth, Big Murray, Ken Kirtland, and half of the Wherrys.

So here we are, so altered ourselves, in a queer changed world of horseless carriages, of living machines, of music delivered by the ether, of confusing young people and of short-haired ladies in knee dresses. Most of us are a little puzzled, sometime, I believe. Younger people do not seem to think as we do; they do not even seem to think quite as we did at their age. Our elderliness (for nearly all of us are afraid we're really beginning to be just a little elderly) is not always entirely comfortable among the new ideas and the new ways of living. Often we'd like to keep things as they are, at least long enough to get used to them.

But we can't do that. The changes go whirling on about our whitening heads; progress isn't going to let us interrupt it; and movement is everlasting; but we—we who have been thirty-five years "safe now in the wide, wide world"—we're not everlasting, not in these corporal forms of ours. So let us meet and look upon one another again and while we may: the chances for that will not be many now, hale as we still are. And when we meet, we have this promise: we shall find it is not altogether true that "nothing really exists except change." For whosoever has within himself true treasure, though he believe it lost, shall find it again if he look well enough within. And the spirit that was ours of old, when we were boys together, that spirit we found and made our own so long ago at Princeton, that selfsame spirit still lives and still shall inform our hearts. More, it had no age. We may be elderly; but it is not, and, unchanged itself, keeps us unchangeably, while still a breath we draw, the Class of Ninety Three, Classmates, comrades of old and companions all, once more we come together as that Class. Happy is the memory of many a meeting we had in our young days, and green be the memory of this one through many cheerful years yet to come for all of you!

TARK.
